Findings from the Gibbon House(12): During the summer holidays Piet looked at another part of the #RobertvanGulik archives: over 300 illustrations and sketches related to the Judge Dee stories. Among them, some of which are only two inches across, was a strange duck in the pond:

The town of Nagasaki, on the picturesque west coast of Kyushu, the extreme western tip of Japan, by its very location was predestined to play an important role in the relations of Japan with foreign nations. The milled coast of Kyushu, rich in excellent natural harbours, since ancient times has attracted junks from Korea, China, and the Liuchiu islands, so that coastal towns like Hirado 平戸, Karatsu 唐津 and Hakata 博多 were centers of a lively trade with the continent. It was Hideyoshi (Toyotomi Hideyoshi 豊臣秀吉 :1536-1598) who was the first to realize that of these various ports Nagasaki was the most favourably situated. He detached the town from the domain of the feudal lord of Ômura 大村, and made Nagasaki a special city, under the direct control of the central government. In 1603 the first Tokugawa shôgun Ieyasu (徳川家康 :1542-1616) stationed at Nagasaki a governor, bugyô 奉行, who was to administer the town in the name

DUTCH SINOLOGUE VAN GULIK

Turkey-red-letter day at the University was January eighth, the occasion of the visit and lecture of Dr. R. H. van Gulik, secretary of the Dutch Legation in Tokyo. Dr. van Gulik has mastered Chinese as his mother tongue, and at the same time, learned English, German, French, Japanese, Sanscrit perfectly and made himself at home with several other languages, including Latin and Greek.

He set himself to master Chinese in his early youth, and now, at the age of thirty, he

MASTER TUNG-KAO

During the turbulent times that marked the end of the Ming and the beginning of the Ch'ing Dynasty, a great number of Chinese Buddhist priests went over to Japan. Not a few of them were learned men, who became famous in Japan, and were greatly respected by both Japanese priests and laymen.

Among these Chinese refugees Master Tung-kao occupies a special place, because of his many-sided personality. He was not only a learned priest, but also an artist of no mean talent; he was a clever painter, an excellent calligrapher, seal-engraver, and at the same time an expert on the ku-ch'in, the Chinese Lute. In China Master Tung-kao is practically unknown; but in Japan he became famous and greatly influenced the cultural life of his time.
